Review

Rich in folklore and psychological insight, The Unfolding Self explores the obvious meanings and hidden meanings of those central metaphorical ideas we use to describe our most profound spiritual metamorphoses: stepping from darkness into light, for example, and the image of being set free from inner captivity, of dying and rebirth, of being cleansed in the heat of a purifying fire. The restored chapters treat the metaphors of integrating the inner wild animal, and unfolding the Tree of Life.

"The book is really about the idea of psycho-spiritual transformation," Metzner summarizes, "and the way people experience it according to the classical traditions. The new chapters are the kind of ecological themes that have become much more central a part of my focus in the time since the book was written." -- By David Templeton, Sonoma County Independent

Mapping Out Life's Terrain: An Interview with Ralph Metzner

Sandra Sarr: In your book, The Unfolding Self, you present 12 universal metaphors for self transformation. How did you come to recognize these metaphors and that they would be useful to people in times of change?

Ralph Metzner: It came to me that there is a universality to the human experience that spans culture, religion, and time. As a therapist and a teacher I heard people--not only philosophers, saints, swamis or Zen masters, but ordinary people, too--describe their experiences using the same metaphors and language as others who had gone through similar experiences. Based on what I was hearing, there seemed to be universal structures that put words to experiences that otherwise would be very hard to name. I began to compare how different people have mapped out life's terrain.

SS: Why does personal transformation so often involve a spiritual component?

RM: Because persons are spiritual beings. If you don't involve a spiritual component, you're leaving something out. It would be analogous to leaving out the body when approaching transformation. We are body-mind-soul-spirit. So if you are involved in transformation you have to talk about all aspects of the human experience. This is what I try to do in my work.

SS: Does the self unfold spontaneously or must one invoke will and intention?

RM: Some patterns of transformation seem to happen by themselves and others are the result of disciplined efforts and intention. Both happen. The kind of deep psychospiritual transformation of self that I talk about in the book doesn't happen casually. There seems to be a law of inertia in psychology just like there is in physics. The law of inertia says do everything the same, business as usual, just keep habitual patterns going. But people do have spontaneous awakening experiences and spontaneous mystical revelations. There may be a trigger like falling in love or having somebody die or taking a drug or watching a sunset or listening to a piece of music.

SS: The spontaneous experience suddenly changes the way people see things?

RM: It suddenly can change everything. Evelyn Underhill, who wrote a lot of books on mysticism, said these spontaneous experiences do happen, but most often they occur in people who have been doing a lot of preparation over time. So it's really both. Transformation can happen to us in dreams or in waking life. Freud said dreams are the royal road to the unconscious. Actually I think he should have said the dreams are the commoners' road to the unconscious because everybody can go. You don't have to be a king. Everybody has dreams. Everybody can have a mystical experience of the most profound sort. And it does happen. -- By Sandra Sarr, The Spire, May 1998

Ralph Metzner, psychotherapist, academic, seeker and author of six books, shares his lifetime of research and experienced realizations in The Unfolding Self. The title says it all; the transformational aspects from various cultures is explained and brought alive with Metzner's even handed and thoughtful writing. He describes the unfolding of the self from the symbolic to the real. Myths, legends and magic sparkle in this coherent work that describes the various avenues of the heroic journey to awareness. In the chapter "Captivity to Liberation" he writes, "We must realize that we are in a trap or a labyrinth; that our character and body are armored and constricted; that there are knots and nets in various areas of our consciousness and our life. If I don't perceive my imprisonment, my boundedness and limitation, there is really no motivation for change." He writes of the reward waiting, when we are motivated to change, "When, through the process and practice of transformation, we no longer experience ourselves as victims of our fate, we can become masters of our destiny." In the end, Metzner reveals the unity of myths, beliefs and traditions characteristic of the ultimate transformation, which is wholeness and connectedness to all things. He has explained the journey and shown us the signposts. All we have to do is pack! -- From Independent Publisher
